

County opens process to consider NW 219th extension

In response to requests from the City of Ridgefield and the Port of Ridgefield, Clark County is considering an extension of NW 219th Street for the county's 20-year road plan ("arterial atlas"). Learn more about the proposed arterial at an open house July 13.

What is the purpose of the open house?

The open house will provide an opportunity to learn more about the proposed extension of NW 219th Street and the road planning process. Maps of the proposed project area will be available and county staff will be there to answer questions.

What is the road planning process?

Later this summer, the Clark County Planning Commission will consider the request to begin planning to extend NW 219th Street. The commission will then forward a recommendation to the Board of Clark County Commissioners. If approved by the Board of Commissioners, the planned extension will be included in the county's 20-year road plan as part of the comprehensive growth management plan. Road projects must be included in the 20-year road plan to be eligible for public funding.

How can I comment?

You will have the opportunity to provide public comment at hearings before the Clark County Planning Commission later this summer and the Board of Clark County Commissioners in October. A notice will be mailed to you to let you know when the hearings have been scheduled.

You may also provide written comment to Mike Mabrey at the Community Development Department, PO Box 9810, Vancouver, WA 98666.
